A NEW MORNING FOR PEARSON PRESS

A personal newspaper finds its voice, one page at a time

BY THE PEARSON PRESS DESIGN DESK

This first prototype establishes the daily paper's shape: six portrait pages, three duplex sheets, strong typography, compact data, and no dependence on color. The finished system will decide what matters overnight, write from verified facts, balance every page, and place a fresh edition in the print queue before morning.

Nothing here is locked. Headlines, page roles, column density, tables, and recurring features are all deliberately visible so they can be judged on paper. The goal is not to imitate a website. It is to create a calm, finite reading experience built around the teams, leagues, sources, and subjects selected in each publication profile.

THE EDITOR'S PROMISE

Useful before exhaustive.
Original before copied.
Readable before clever.
Personal before generic.
Correct before fast.

SUNDAY

The weekend paper expands to 10-12 pages with weekly reviews, projections, long-form features, history, and puzzles.

MORNING BRIEFING

SPORT

Active seasons control the space, while favorite teams remain guaranteed.

NEWS

Multiple reports become one concise, attributed briefing instead of repeated headlines.

PRINT

Every page is checked for clipping, missing sources, gray contrast, and duplex parity.

Today's question

What should earn a permanent place in your morning paper?

WHAT THE EDITOR WOULD FEATURE

A finish, a milestone, and a game with consequences

The selection engine should not reward every final score equally. It should elevate close finishes, favorite teams, records, rivalry games, playoff leverage, and performances that change the shape of a season. This module is where the daily paper becomes editorial rather than encyclopedic.

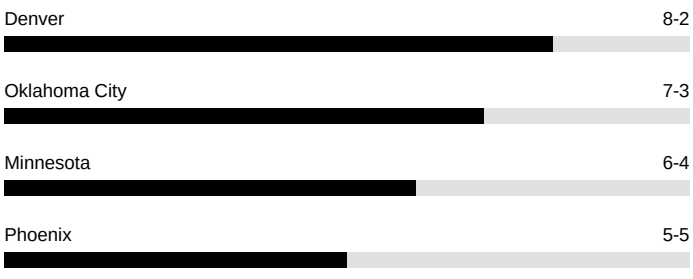
FORM GUIDE - LAST 10



PLAYOFF PRESSURE

Standings should reveal movement, not merely rank. The final module can flag clinching scenarios, elimination numbers, games back, recent form, strength of schedule, and changes since yesterday's edition.

The News Desk

SAMPLE DATA

A finite briefing assembled from the sources selected in your profile

One event, one clear briefing

THE PEARSON PRESS NEWSROOM

A useful morning paper should reduce repetition. When several enabled publishers cover the same event, Pearson Press will cluster their reporting, preserve each source, compare factual claims, and produce one original summary.

The profile decides which publishers may contribute. The editorial engine then weighs freshness, authority, personal relevance, geographic importance, and whether the story has materially changed since the prior edition.

This prototype reserves one page for general sports and world news. On a quiet day, it may hold short briefs. On a consequential day, one story can take the lead while the rest move into a narrow digest.
